Metro Encourages Public Input on NextGen Bus Study; Launches New Online Interactive Engagement Tool

The Los Angeles County Metropolitan Transportation Authority (Metro) has launched a new online interactive engagement tool to gather more public input as part of the agency's NextGen Bus Study.

The study, launched in January, is designed to create a new bus network that is more relevant, reflective of, and attractive to the residents of Los Angeles County when it launches in the fall of 2019. This effort will improve service to current customers, attract new customers and win back past customers.

"We really want to encourage the public to use this online engagement tool to let us know what's important to them as users of the system and, more importantly, any changes they would like to see," said Los Angeles County Supervisor and Metro Board Chair Sheila Kuehl.

The new online engagement tool can be found at metro.net/nextgen by clicking on the icon labeled "Rank Your Priorities." Once there, users can choose from a menu of items that helps them decide what's most important to them as bus riders – for example more midday, evening or weekend service or more real-time information.

Input gathered over the next few months will be used by Metro to design conceptual bus network service plans for public review.

"We hope to gather significant feedback and comments through this process to develop service plans that will meet the needs of our riders and get them where they need to go," said Metro CEO Phillip A. Washington.

About Metro

The Los Angeles County Metropolitan Transportation Authority (Metro) is unique among the nation's transportation agencies. Created in 1993, Metro is a multimodal transportation agency that transports about 1.3 million passengers daily on a fleet of 2,200 clean air buses and six rail lines. The agency also oversees bus, rail, highway and other mobility-related building projects and leads transportation planning and programming for Los Angeles County.
