at nearly 70 kids and San Gabriel Valley Division 9 was a close second place with almost 60.

The event was organized – more like master planned, considering the size – by Liz Porras, a human resources assistant. With so many, Porras had to create a schedule to rectify the desire to see it all with the need to keep things flowing smoothly. But creating and sticking to schedules is what Metro does best and Porras's schedule was no different.

The undertaking included communicating with the tour locations, but also with vendors for T-shirts, Aramark for a deal with the Metro Cafe to feed the little ones and the services within Metro to get the kids moved around from place to place.

For each participating division, Porras created a grid to see that all the children got the benefit of a full tour. The Red Line, Metro Security, Metro Copy Center, Metro Design Studio and Customer Information Department were only some of the stops available to see.

This year's event was themed "Making Choices for a Better World," crafted around Metro's desire to help ease the problems of traffic congestion and pollution (just to name two).
