

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."

<https://archive.kpcc.org/blogs/politics/2013/12/25/15476/rail-yard-along-la-river-may-become-city...>

Southern California Public Radio

2 min read

Rail yard along LA River may become city's next park

A former rail yard along the Los Angeles River may become the city's next park. The city plans to buy the land using up to $26 million dollars in clean water bond funds from Proposition O, which voters approved in 2004. The 44-acre site is near Cypress Park.

View Taylor Yard

Winter said the state has more experience negotiating with the railroad, and can get a better price. Other parts of Taylor Yard were sold to California and transformed into Rio de Los Angeles state park.

"This is a key piece of property and we shouldn't be paying any more for it than we need to," she said.

Lewis MacAdams, president of Friends of the L.A. River said he wants the land to ultimately become a park run by the state. "They're a natural choice, but I ultimately don't think it matters. The point is to get the land into public hands, and to be able to restore and maintain it," he said.

Acquisition of Taylor Yard's 44-acre parcel, known as G-2 was added into the project budget in 2007, with a City Council-approved land purchase budget $25 million and an expected overall project cost of $78 million. By 2009, the land acquisition budget had been chopped in half, to $12.4 million.

This year, the administrative committee overseeing spending of the Prop O bond funds authorized the $26 million figure to buy the land.

Aaron Hunt, spokesman for Union Pacific Railroad Co., said "We have not put a value on it. It has been on the market for some time."